The school is a private subsidiary of the Hong Kong University of Public Fund. The school specialises in vocational training and the provision of degree award courses in cooperation with foreign universities. History in the early 1950s showed the need for further training opportunities in the colony. The findings of the Keswick Report (1952) and the Jennings-Logan Report (1953) made recommendations to colonial rule to establish a new department to provide adult education programs. [1] On 21 May 1957, HKU established an out-of-mural research institute with 330 students. The ministry intended to develop and manage courses for the needs of Hong Kong's growing colony. These included library studies in response to the opening of the first library in the area and the Housing Administration to cope with the growing housing crises that plagued the colony in the 1960s. [2] In January 1992, the institution was designated as a vocational and continuing education school. This change increased its role vis-à-vis its parent organisation, gave it financial independence and gave it more freedom to take decisions on the programmes offered.
